All these PATENT BEDSTEADS are constructed with Dovetail Joints, and are as firm, when put together, as if of one piece of metal, but at the same time can be put up and taken down in a few minutes without the use of tools, being entirely free from screw and rivet, and the better class are made of brass, (either parallel or taper tubes cased upon iron), or of patent taper iron tubing, ornamentally japanned. They are fitted with improved patent iron lath bottoms, and all but the most common are upon Cope and Collinson's patent castors, the use of which for Metallic Bedsteads is confined to this firm. The lower-priced solid iron ones will be found equally good in point of strength and durability with the more expensive Bedsteads.

The Editor of the ART UNION, in an interesting account of these Patent Bedsteads, after stating that he had in all cases visited the Establishments he described, so as to be able to check the information received, and the suggestions obtained, by his own observations and experience, remarks as follows:—"Other Manufacturers in Birmingham are occupied in producing and improving these objects, and we have directed attention to their merits; but this firm demands detailed and separate consideration, inasmuch as it is a branch of trade to which their attention is exclusively directed, to which they are consequently enabled to direct all their energies, and in which they have greatly excelled. * * * We are bound in justice to add, that their productions are the best of the manufacture we have hitherto been enabled to examine; the best in design—the best in construction—and the simplest in principle."
